LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

153 FLEET STREET, LONDON.

MONDAY NIGHT.

All goes well at Verdun at present.

A statement made by M. Briand, the French Premier, to a journalist, and published in the Paris papers, throws a light on the fearful fighting.

The Germans were allowed to advance until they thought themselves in possession of Douaumont.

When the French launched a counter-attack by one of their Army Corps which had been held in reserve.

This sudden and furious offensive took the enemy un-awares, and they abandoned much that they had won, while the French re-established themselves in their formidable positions.

The Germans claim to-day "to have cleared the Meuse loop around Champeigne."

This is a euphemism for the failure of the great effort which they made last week.

After the capture of Samogneux on Wednesday the great object of the Germans was to open the French in this loop.

It was the most important of the French line.

For a space of three miles they had the River Meuse in their rear.

To be caught in this loop was to be lost.

From the danger position the French have emerged. The river has been cleared of their left flank.

The tremendous fighting on their left flank, which lies just east of the loop, is explained by the desire of the Germans to trap the French.

The French, and the equally determined effort of the French not to be trapped.

Our gallant Allies succeeded. They are now at Vaucourt, the point where the river Meuse crosses the French line.

There is bound to be more tremendous fighting in this sector, which normally would be held by two divisions of the French.

The French, and the equally determined effort of the French not to be trapped.
